One of the things that continues to amaze me is the trend among families – even church members – to favor travel sports over church participation for their kids. Parental hopes for a future athletic scholarship – or just the chance to live vicariously through their kids’ athletic exploits – is teaching those young people that faith is a lesser priority.

But according to a story from Forbes, “A new study from Harvard’s T.H. Chan School of Public Health finds that kids and teens who are raised with religious or spiritual practices tend to have better health and mental health as they age.”

Forbes reports: “It turned out that those who attended religious services at least once a week as children or teens were about 18% more likely to report being happier in their 20s than those who never attended services. They were also almost 30% more likely to do volunteer work and 33% less likely to use drugs in their 20s as well.”

But what was interesting was that it wasn’t just about how much a person went to services, but it was at least as much about how much they prayed or meditated in their own time. Those who prayed or meditated every day also had more life satisfaction, were better able to process emotions and were more forgiving compared to those who never prayed/meditated. They were also less likely to have sex at an earlier age and to have a sexually transmitted infection.

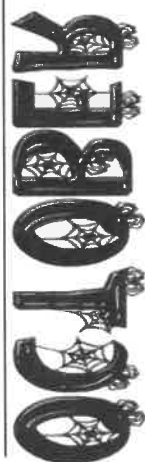

Though I do not have children of my own, I’m grateful for the parents I had who insisted on our being in church “every time the doors were open.” It’s made all the difference in my life. Putting sports above faith in kids’ lives is not only unhealthy – it may be making an eternal difference in those kids’ lives, and not for the better.

Watch over Thy children, O Lord, as their days increase; bless and guide them wherever they may be. Strengthen them when they stand; comfort them when discouraged or sorrowful; raise them up if they fall; and in their hearts may Thy peace which passeth understanding abide all the days of their life; through Jesus Christ our Lord.
Amen
